or operational spatial databases or non-spatial databases, which are also somehow linked to a spatial database or a spatial meaning. In addition to mission related databases, these organizations either have or access several databases comprising such as census, economic, security, image, multimedia, statistical information for planning, intelligence, decision and policy making. The extended size of these data sets makes it difficult to search for meaningful patterns or relationships among data. The complexity of spatial data and intrinsic spatial relationships limits the usefulness of conventional data mining techniques for extracting spatial patterns. Spatial data mining is the discovery of interesting hidden patterns and characteristics that may be implicitly in spatial databases. This paper aims to produce a descriptive model for examining the suitability in settlements by applying various machine learning techniques to figure out the knowledge discovery in spatial databases (KDSD). The study illustrates the unique hallmark that characterizes the spatial data mining by conducting the data mining algorithms. Moreover, the study presents the importance of spatial data mining and discussed multiple data sets preprocessing, classification fun Data Structures With Abstract Data Types and Modula-2.
